Book Review

Poteete, A. R., M. R. Janssen and E. Ostrom. 2010. Working Together: Collective Action, the Commons, and Multiple Methods in Practice. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Reviewed by Alan Sznajd, CSIRO Sustainable Ecosystems.

The book raises the challenge of integrating theoretical, empirical and methodological dimensions of research on commons and public, non-market domain issues. The authors set the scene by highlighting what methodological problems (descriptive versus prescriptive, for instance) might be raised in comparative, methodological arguments, and lack of cooperation. The reader gets a very critical introduction to some facets of the methodological problems. Figure 2.1 and the paragraph right to it, is a very good example. As part of the methodological discussion the problem of methodological approaches to the study of commons are discussed in providing multiple case studies over time. The part starts with approaches that serve individual case studies and points to the fact that such approaches are not enough. But it also sets the stage for contrasting multiple, multi-scale approaches to the study of commons. It then discusses how to integrate multiple case studies. Then, the authors distinguish between broadly comparative and broad general, historical, and collaborative approaches. This distinction opens an interesting path for research design, integrating multiple case studies. Broadly comparative research means that the design and implementation of research that involves multiple case studies while remaining distinct. The authors do not provide an answer to the question of how to integrate multiple case studies. However, some ideas could be introduced as a response to the question of how to integrate multiple case studies. The authors also suggest that the design of research could be applied to test some of the main findings and help designing new case
